Public Interest is Great.

The deep interest in the outcome of the election was signified by the throngs which gathered at every place where returns were received. As each bulletin was thrown on the screen or read by some stronglunged individual deafening applause would rend the air and the only complaints to be heard were on the ground that the reports were all one way. Early in the evening it became apparent that the republicans had swon a victory, not only locally, but in the country at large, and the demo crats soon vanished, leaving the town in the possession of their opponents.

The novel feature introduced by Manager Atkins of the telephone company by which subscribers were furnished the returns as fast as they came in proved to be a popular innovation.

Owing to the size of the ballot and the numerous scratchings, no definite figures were obtainable in the city at midnight. although the straight tickets indicated that the republicans had carried the day by from 500 to 600 votes. When City Marshal Albro acting under the instructions of the city council, went to notify the motor company to stop the work of laying a second track on South Main street, he discovered one lone laborer leisurely tearing up the granite paving. 3,000 Projectiles a Minute. Our Newcastle-on-Tyne corresponden informs us, says the London Times, that a machine gun of a novel character has been invented by James Judge, a well known engineer of Newcastle, who thus describes it:

A Powderless Machine Gan that Fires

The gun is a patent centrifugal quickfiring machine gun; it is five feet high and weighs about five hundredweight. It is intended for battleship, earthworks and garrison purposes. The motive power is electricity transmitted to a motor attached to the side of the gun. In view of the great confidence felt by all republicans in the result in Iowa and the lack of any great contest in this state, the result is especialy gratifying.

At midnight, Chairman Weaver of the republican state central committee said Returns from 263 precincts in Iowa so far received show a net gain for the republicans of twenty votes to the precinct. This ratio, carried out, will mean a plurality for McKinley in Iowa, of over 100,000. Certainly lows will give that much, which would be the largest majority ever given by the state for any party." The plurality for McKinley in 1896, was 65,552, Returns show that a heavy vote has been cast all over the state. The result in the congressional fights cannot yet be told, although the indications are that all the republican congressmen will be elected. trict, Rumple, republican, has a majority of 500.

"I had an experience of that kind once myself. It occured to me that a revolving bookcase would be a handy thing for office use and I had one built to order. sions I thought vaguely of having the device patented, but dismissed the scheme as 'not worth while.' Nearly two years afterward a more intelligent gentleman up in New England did what I wouldn't do and today he is rolling in riches. I have been obliged to buy one of his cases since and I never hated to give up the money so badly in my life. Several other instances in the same line have come under my personal observation.

"I have a friend, for instance, who stumbled upon the principle of the Bell telephone long before the war. He was at college at the time and he and a fellow student actually went so far as to construct an experimental line over half a mile long. They had it in successful operation for several weeks, when it was discovered and destroyed by a cantankerous professor, and thus vanished what might have been one of the biggest fortunes in the world. The incident had almost faded from my friend's mind when Prof. Bell launched his invention on the public. "Another gentleman who was formerly a client of mine anticipated the pneumatic tire years before somebody else patented He is fond of fine horses, and away bearings on which it is constructed. His comments on the incident wouldn't sound well at a prayer

WHAT A FOG COSTS.

Estimated in Various Ways-For In-stance in Regard to Health. The cost of a day's genuine fog in town can be estimated in different ways, says a writer in the Contemporary Review. About a dozen years ago. i. e., just before the electric light had seriously interfered with the street illumination by gas alone, the calculation in pounds, shillings and peace worked thus: Statistics furnished by one chief company showed that 35,000,-000 cubic feet in excess were consumed on a single day of fog. This was computed to be a quantity sufficient for a year's supply of gas to a town of 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants. Adding to this the extra supply demanded at the same time of two other metropolitan companies, the total excess of gas amounted to 150,000,000 cubic feet, or, put it in another way, the cost of the day's fog in gas to London could not be put at a less figure than $35,000 or $40,000. Then, as to the cost in health, we have a statement in the Lancet from a health officer who is prepared to take the lenient view, that in spite of a few days' discomfort people after a fog live on pretty much as before. He is ready to admit that to counterbalance the bad effect of mechanical irritation there is possible goed to be derived from inhaling carbonaceous matter by reason of such matter being a disinfectant, while, as the result of actual measurement, there is shown to be present all the while pretty much the normal amount of oxygen. For all this, the writer is convinced that the mischief wrought goes far beyond streaming eyes and smarting nostrils. There are other products in the baneful air besides the particles of simple In the Second and Sixth districts the fight soot, sulphurous ammonical acid and oris close. In Muscatine, in the Second dis- gante particles, which, when added to the usual accompaniment of a lowering of temperature, must tell materially against the infirm or aged.

But this question has been approached in yet another way. Prof. Oliver, in a preliminary report to the scientific committee of the Royal Horticultural society a few years back, details the result of scraping twenty square yards of the roofs of glass houses at Kew and also at Chelsea, which had been carefully washed down previous to a visitation of a fog. In both cases the weight of deposit was about the same, thirty grains per square yard, or six tons per square mile. Proceeding to analyze the deposit collected at the more densely inhabited locality, there was found about 40 per cent of mineral matter to 36 per cent of carbon, while the analysis yielded 5 per cent and 114 per cent of sulphurous acid and hydrocloric acid, respectively. There was also a considerable proportion-viz., 15 per cent-of hydrocarbons, to which was attributed the familiar oleaginous character of fogs as we know them.

LURED THE DOG TO COMBAT.

Wise New York Cat Established Her Authority in a Cafe. Cats and dogs do not fraternize as a general thing, though now and then they strike up an alliance. An interesting instance of this took place in an uptown cafe the other night, but not until after the cat and the dog involved were, in accordance with the usual custom, at swords' point. The dog was Captain, a particularly smart cocker spaniel. The cat was Lena, who as her name suggests, is fond of frankfurters and Swiss cheese, and who against all dogs. Lena is a fighter and dogs, barring Captain, are her pet aversion Captain belongs to John Hogan, the oldtime minstrel man, and it came to pass that the first time he ventured into Lena's stronghold he was looking for trouble, says the New York Times. Lena never exerts herself to avoid trouble and Captain was accommodated before his visit was over. Lena posted her forfeit and lost no time in quibbling over the time for weighing in The point of the story, however, is the deliberate manner in which Lena brought about the conflict. It seems that Lena has two feline as sociates who are of a peaceable nature. When Captain appeared on the scene the two timid cats were sharing a bone which Captain at once appropriated. Lena was close by taking note of the proceedings. For a minute she did nothing but think. Her plan of campaign figured out, she arose and slowly walked behind the lunch counter. Her actions were noted by Captain's owner and others, who, knowing Lean's prowess as a repeller of dog boarders, had regarded Captain's temerity with amazement. Lena's plan was apparent when she emerged from behind the lunch counter with another bone. This she carried to within a few feet of Captain, where she laid it down and then coolly stepped aside to await developments. It was a palpable challenge. Captain accepted the issue instanter. He walked over, took Lena's bone in his teeth and then put his foot on the other bone. The next instant he had other things to attend to than bones. Lena was on his back and the battle was on. Captain is a valuable dog and the combatants were quickly pulled apart. Captain was minus a few locks of hair, while Lena had the bone and a smile of triumph.

Captain and Lena are friendly enough now, although Captain has not yet recov ered from his surprise at discovering that there is one cat that not only doesn't go out of its way to avoid dogs, but lures them into conflict as well.
